The Ravenhead Story

The Ravenhead story began in 1842 when founder Frances Dixon opened a glass factory in St Helens, North West England. He passed his ownership down to his sons, and the family business developed from strength to strength, over three generations.

The factory's location played a huge part in Ravenhead's success. As an industrial town, St Helens had access to many fuel supplies, especially with its roots as a coal-mining town since the 14th century. The Sankey Canal provided transport links to Liverpool and Cheshire markets, as well as the River Mersey, enabling easy distribution throughout the North West during the Industrial Revolution.

On 31st March 1913, Ravenhead was amalgamated with five other glass companies to form United Glass Bottle Manufacturers (UGB). This merger resulted in the investment of automatic bottle-making machines, which revolutionised the speed of production.

Ravenhead in the 1930s branched out into domestic tableware such as bowls, jugs and drinking glasses, many of which were inspired by the Art Deco era. It was during this era that Ravenhead developed some long-lasting partnerships with iconic brands such as Elizabeth Arden. Ravenhead's first decorating machine produced the cosmetics leader's world-famous white cream jar. The machine was then used to decorate a variety of pots, jars and bottles including milk bottles decorated with the name of the farmer's dairies.

In the 1970s, Ravenhead was in its hey-day. It was the largest maker of table glass in the UK and was exporting to over 100 countries, producing 200 million glasses per year. During this time, leading designers John Clappison, Annette Meech, David Queensbury and Alexander Hardie Williamson created much-loved ranges such as Siesta, Barmaster, Elegance, White Fire, Apollo & Solar. In 1973, Ravenhead produced the well-known blue Vicks pots and Milk of Magnesia bottles for the pharmaceutical industry. Thanks to Ravenhead's first TV advertising campaign in 1972, its popularity grew and items such as the bestselling White Fire range were commonly requested as wedding gifts and remarkable sales followed.

Today's Ravenhead, thanks to its foundations, has built an enviable international reputation for high quality glassware that combines strength and durability. We offer exceptional glassware from across our value, mid-range and premium collections, helping to cater for all occasions. Whether you are entertaining friends at home or need glassware for a formal event, we have a range to suit your needs.
